Excerpt: .satisfactory information is available. To get data concerning the growth and food cost several feeding experiments have been made by the New York experiment station. Six lots of capons and one of cockerels were fed for several months and several lots of capons for shorter periods of several weeks. Birds of several breeds and crosses were used, chiefly Asiatics, but none of the smaller breeds. No special comparison of breeds was attempted, although for the most part each lot was of one breed. To all of these fowls sweet skim milk was fed nearly all of the time in place of water. Much of the time it constituted about 60 of the total food, supplying generally from 12 to 15 of the total dry matter in the ration. For the eight lots for which records were kept the longest time, from hatching to maturity, the lowest pound cost, live weight, was at the average weight of 4 pounds. Largely because the market prices were always lower for the smaller fowls the cost of food to grow the birds 42 pounds represented the highest proportion (a little over 50) of the market value found at any time from earliest marketable size as broilers to the heaviest capons. From the time the capons weighed 5 pounds until they weighed 102 pounds the total cost of food consumed did not at any time reach half of the market value. Although the cost of every pound added...
