The knowledge of the true formation of the character of all individuals, opens a new book of life to man, and elevates him at once, from an irrational imaginative animal, ever opposing his own happiness and the happiness of others, to a rational being, well knowing how to promote the happiness of others and to secure his own. For man to know himself is indeed great knowledge; because it is the foundation of true wisdom, union, and happiness, and makes their attainment plain and easy; and will lead gradually to that superior state of existence, when Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity will be understood, and will become the general practice of society and when rapid approaches will be made towards the promised and expected Millennium. To make all men good, wise, and happy, is indeed impracticable to those who have been trained in the supposition...
